UNC System's Division of Academic Affairs and Faculty Assembly announce faculty fellows program; deadline November 10

The University of North Carolina System's Division of Academic Affairs, in collaboration with the Faculty Assembly, is sponsoring a faculty fellows program to engage interested faculty in academic affairs issues and mentored learning opportunities while tapping individual expertise to assist the UNC General Administration (GA) and constituent institutions. The program seeks to identify faculty members who have the potential for effective leadership. Fellows will also have the chance to become familiar with other General Administration initiatives as well as current challenges for public higher education at the state and national levels. Fellows will assume responsibility for special projects and will participate in ongoing routine activities in the Division of Academic Affairs. The overarching goals of the program for fellows include enhancing understanding of the complex landscape of public higher education, understanding the context for system-level decision making, and contributing to system-wide activities and initiatives in service to the constituent institutions.

Details on the program and the application process are here. Applications are due November 10, 2015.

Enhancing the Impact of Scholarship: How Authors Can Better Reach Readers in the New Publishing Economy (UNC-Duke cosponsored event at Duke, November 5)

The UNC Libraries, UNC School of Information and Library Science, UNC Center for Media Law and Policy and the Duke Center for Study of the Public Domain, are pleased to sponsor this Authors Alliance Event:

Enhancing the Impact of Scholarship: How Authors Can Better Reach Readers in the New Publishing Economy

The Edge Workshop Room | Bostock Library | Duke University

November 5, 2015, 3:30pm to 5:00pm with reception to follow

Free and open to the public. RSVP encouraged. Register here: <http://authorsalliance.org/duke>

How and when does open access benefit authors?

What's the difference between open access and public access?

What uses of social media can enhance the impact of your work?

Do "open" models work outside the sciences?

How can I persuade my tenure committee that my scholarship is having impact?

Authors who write to be read care about how their works are published and what that means for reader access, but the range of academic publishing outlets available can seem daunting. While conventional book and journal publishing still predominate in many fields, new opportunities exist to share scholarly works—everything from open access journals and institutional repositories to academic blogging and personal websites. Even scholarly monographs are increasingly made available under Creative Commons licenses. What works best to get scholarly ideas out there and under what circumstances?

This is a panel discussion with Authors Alliance, where we will explore the opportunities and challenges scholars face in maximizing the impact of their work. Authors Alliance will introduce a new, author-oriented guide to the ins and outs of open access publishing and explain why authors of books should consider rights reversions.

Panelists include:

- James Boyle (moderator) William Neal Reynolds Professor of Law, Duke Law
- Tori Ekstrand, Assistant Professor, UNC School of Media and Journalism
- Pamela Samuelson, Richard M. Sherman Distinguished Professor of Law, UC Berkeley Law School
- John Sherer, Spangler Family Director, UNC Press
- Kevin Smith, Director of Copyright and Scholarly Communication, Duke Libraries
- Harry Watson, Atlanta Alumni Distinguished Professor of Southern Culture, UNC History
